Subject: RE: shielding and care homes

Thanks for looping me in – yes to the point that people who are symptomatic (but not tested) and those recovering from COVID 19 to transfer into care homes.

On my Thursday call last week with the CEO's of the 8 big providers of care homes they were expecting that to be the position and whilst want maximum protection and avoidance in place, they are realistic position cannot last for ever.

The point on could hygiene and isolation is more important – just as they would do with an outbreak of DandV M

Morning Ros

Whilst the prospect is perhaps what none of us would wish to plan for I believe the reality will be that we will need to discharge Covid-19 positive patients into residential care settings for the reason you have noted.

This will be entirely clinically appropriate because the NHS will triage those to retain in acute settings who can benefit from that sector's care.

The numbers of people with disease will rise sharply within a fairly short timeframe and I suspect make this fairly normal practice and more acceptable but I do recognise that families and care homes will not welcome this in the initial phase.

Best wishes
Jenny
