the UK Government to do something, so care should be taken when briefing the media on the plans for Christmas.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that he welcomed the change to a system of localised tiers. The loosening of restrictions should not be oversold. The new arrangements would allow for minimal economic activity to resume, but they were only baby steps and would still be problematic for many businesses, especially those in areas that had been subject to tougher restrictions for longer. Some businesses were facing a three month lockdown which was the same as earlier that year. It may still be the right decision, but Cabinet Ministers should be cognisant of the implications of the decisions they were taking. HM Treasury had offered all the support that it could, including extending the Job Retention (furlough) Scheme, fully funded, until the end of March 2021 and providing grants of up to £3,000 for businesses to be able to cover their rent. The Government could not get into the habit of giving out more cash each time it put more restrictions in place. It was costing a fortune and not sustainable for the country's finances.

Continuing, THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that consideration should be given to the return of students to universities in January. It would involve a difficult conversation, but lessons had to be learned from what had happened in September. On mass testing, he welcomed the evolution of the proposal from that considered by the Covid-19 Operations Committee the previous day. There would be a standard formula for financial support to local areas depending on which tier they were in. It would be up to local leaders whether they wanted to spend this money on mass testing.

In discussion, the following points were made:

- a) the Cabinet approved the return to a localised, tiered system as set out in the paper. It was a sensible and balanced approach;
- b) for the first time, the Prime Minister would be able to set out a plan to get to the light at the end of the tunnel;
- c) businesses would appreciate the knowledge of when life would be back to normal, even if it was months from now, so they could confidently start investing in preparations, make contractual commitments and sell tickets;
- d) strong buy-in from local leaders was essential, as had been seen in Liverpool. It would be useful to understand the extent to
